

Council asks us for bold direction

SUPPORTERS ... proud to live here are Gold Coast Ambassadors Andrew Stone and Pam Ellis with (centre) chief lifeguard Warren Young.

City looks ahead

THE Gold Coast public is being given a chance to say what sort of city it wants.

The Bold Future initiative aims at developing a blueprint for the next three decades using surveys and forums.

Chief lifeguard Warren Young gave the council project his backing because the city was growing so fast it needed checks and balances.

“The city has changed considerably in my 36 years here, and now we need to look to the future,” he said.

New ambassador Pam Ellis said it was fantastic the council was enlisting public support.

“The council will take on board what the public has to say through forums and surveys – after all, the public see what is going on in the city day to day,” she said.

Fellow ambassador Andrew Stone said the blueprint was about balancing urban development, industry and economic development with environmental issues and preserving the Coast’s character.

“Being able to sustain all the strengths and attribute we have here as a community, already, for the next 30 years is vitally important,” he said.
